What are graduate-level professional development credits?

Graduate-level professional development credits are not part of a degree program but instead are primarily used for professional advancement such as salary increment steps and recertification. Students should seek approval of appropriate district or college officials before enrolling for these micro-credentials to satisfy any degree, state credential, or local school district requirements.

EXAMPLE

(from a workshop about creativity)

DATE	TIME	ACTIVITY	REFLECTION
May 12	1 ½ hours	Searched the internet for 3 resources to use for Assignment #2. I wanted to find articles about creativity for second graders, explaining rubrics to students.	I had difficulty finding information about creativity particularly as it relates to second graders. I found more about creativity for adults, but I was able to apply the information about adults to children when I combined it with information about developmental stages. I would like to do more to enhance students' creativity, although I am finding that the rules we enforce at this grade level may inhibit creativity.
May 15	1 hours	Brainstormed about the type of project I would like to do so I could begin my outline	I thought about lesson plans I could do with students and about coaching I could do with parents to help inspire student creativity. I settled on a homework assignment that I will send home with students to parents and ask parents to comment on as well.
May 16	3 hours	I thought more about the project I want to do, and I want to also consider doing a presentation for parents that I can do "live" with groups but also record and have available for them to view. I started to write a script for a recorded version.	It is difficult to determine my ultimate project. I have so many options, but I know I need to settle on one, and I can always expand my ideas after this course. It is funny that I am working on a project about creativity and having my own "battles" with being creative.
